Project 369 – Inequality as a Trap: The Path to the Human Being...

*Where a difference was once imposed,
a road begins, one along which everyone walks:
either — toward justifying one's weakness,
or toward becoming a Human Being.*

We live in a world where external differences constantly strive to become internal limitations. This is how society, upbringing, and culture are structured — however, this is not how the human being is structured. The previous article in this series was devoted to exposing one of the most persistent myths — the idea of inequality as a natural, biologically predetermined, and socially fixed difference. That inequality, in its essence, is more often not truth, it is deception, implanted into consciousness — especially into the consciousness of women — as a means of self-limitation, self-ignorance, and refusal of the path toward one's own becoming. However, this deception DOES NOT END HERE. Where a difference was once imposed, there begins not merely a problem, but a road. A road along which everyone can choose: whether to move toward justifying one's weakness — or toward becoming a Human Being. And this choice does not depend on gender, age, social status, or education. It depends on the DEGREE OF AWARENESS, on the readiness to overcome inner falsehood, cultural illusions, and one's own laziness.

This second article is about inequality as a trap into which not only women, but also men fall, if they accept rules built not by the Higher, rather by their own weakness. Here we raise the bar higher — from the critique of falsehood to a strategy of development. From the analysis of difference — to the synthesis of the Human Being. Yes, to become a Human Being, a biography alone is not enough. Inner work is required — persistent, honest, without allowances for "gender," "character," or a "difficult past." Inequality is NOT THE INITIAL point; it is a trial through which one either loses oneself or rises. And if you are ready — not merely to read, but to understand and accept what is said — then you have already taken one step. And every step in this direction, as we now know, is a step toward Victory over death and the overcoming of aging. And this — is no longer an image, it is a Vector.

We are different — that is a fact. Yet we live in ONE REALITY, and it makes no distinctions between those who stand before its summits. Mountains do not ask who you are — woman or man. They demand only one thing: to carry yourself, to carry the load, to carry responsibility. And if it is harder for you than for others — this is not a reason to demand concessions, it is a signal that earlier you evaded, sidestepped, or failed to complete your work. And now — by the law of balance — you have been given a chance to finish it. This is true Justice. I would not speak so directly if I had not seen with my own eyes how a woman who stopped lying to herself became stronger and wiser than many men — not because she imitated them, rather because she accepted the full measure of labor, honesty, and responsibility. Such women are blessed — not because they are equal to men, rather because they have transcended notions of gender by becoming Human.

When you become Human, GENDER RECEDES into the background. Only those who are fixated on sexual identity suffer from it — and turn it into the cause of their misfortunes. A shallow perception of differences between the sexes is not a problem of nature, rather EVIDENCE OF THE NARROWNESS of human consciousness — of an unwillingness to think more deeply. The more you emphasize “femininity” or “masculinity” as a justification or a privilege, the further you move away from the Human. This is a law — not of society, rather of the Spirit.

As long as you are convinced that men are created differently and therefore do not feel fear, pain, or fatigue — you will remain at an animal level of perception. A man, just like a woman, can be afraid. He also wants to run away, to cry, to give up. However, he is taught — to restrain himself. His destiny demands restraint. And this is not cruelty; it is a FORM OF MATURATION.

The Soul has no gender. It has a task. And if you were born a woman or a man, your task is not to argue with that, it is to become the one who does the maximum possible within this given configuration. Refusal to accept one’s destiny is the true lie to oneself. And it does not matter in what form it is expressed — from surgical interventions to psychological fantasies about a different nature. A lie remains a lie if it tears you away from your path.

Do not turn a problem into a “women’s issue” merely to avoid solving it. A problem is a problem — and it is solved THROUGH EFFORT. The illusion that women achieve something differently than men is merely a way to postpone the moment of the feat. And in the end, someone else decides for her. This is — capitulation before reality. Had you acted immediately, with full responsibility, there would be no need later to double your efforts in compensation. This — is THE VERY HONESTY you are seeking. Everything else is an attempt to turn indulgence¹ into a virtue. Relaxation, leniency, surrender may be acceptable — yet only when the situation is complete, when the path has been walked. If they become a way of life — it is self-deception. It is empty power, slipping through one’s fingers, impossible to reclaim.

A woman, however, has a different task. She is given the capacity to give birth, to carry, to care. THIS IS GREAT. However, it is only part of the task. If a woman has fulfilled the biological program, this alone does not yet make her a personality. It is also not enough for a man merely to conceive — he is required to grow, as consciousness, as spirit, as a knowing being. And here the main path opens — the one that leads not to the birth of bodies, rather to the BIRTH OF MEANINGS.

Every being is obliged to grow — in understanding, in awareness, in the capacity to carry one's own Being. And whoever does not follow this path will sooner or later encounter the meaninglessness of their life. A man senses this emptiness more acutely, because he does not have a natural program that BRIGHTENS EVERYTHING with the meaning of motherhood. Therefore, he is closer to the Path of Knowledge — and can point toward it. And a woman, if she wishes to become not merely a mother but also a Teacher, a Guardian, and a Mentor, must follow this direction.

Knowledge is not a bonus, not a game, not an ornament to life. It is the second stage of being, possible only for those who have overcome instincts, who have learned to live without external support and have honestly seen that to live for the body means to die in spirit. Only one who has BECOME HUMAN can enter Knowledge — one who has passed the school of survival, discernment, and will, who knows how to limit oneself for the sake of something higher. And here lies the main trap: a woman's soul, entering the territory of Knowledge, almost always carries distorted motivation — to justify herself, to receive, to prove — and this destroys the path. The only exceptions are those women who were called onto this path — cunningly, gently, deceived by false goals, yet later, drawn onward, became TRUE SEEKERS. It is precisely this feminine flexibility that makes their initiation possible — if it is accompanied by honesty and love for Knowledge as such. Then it no longer matters who is to blame — feminine nature or social deception — what matters is what to do with it. Here one must understand the deep difference in the structure of the masculine and feminine principles: a woman encompasses many directions simultaneously, trying to hold everything at once, while a man — chooses one and brings it to completion. Therefore, the strength given equally to all is dispersed in a woman and gathered in a man; this is not a problem — THIS IS THE LAW OF FORM. Yet if a woman nevertheless wants strength — she needs clarity of direction, she must acknowledge that dispersion is not a virtue, it is a challenge; she needs a man not as a master, rather as a vector, as a focus, and then together they are not opposites, they are a system in which harmony can arise — yet only when each of them agrees to be Human.

The consistent growth of a woman becomes possible only when she BEGINS TO RECOGNIZE not so much the man as the masculine nature within herself. This, incidentally, is also true for men — for they too must walk the path of knowing the feminine principle within themselves. But now — this is not about them. A woman who becomes "like a man" does not lose her femininity; rather, she goes beyond standard templates and therefore becomes SOMETHING GREATER than a man. She overcomes a double distance: both the fact that her nature is less adapted to the struggle for the external, and the fact that the environment itself instills this incapacity in her as a norm. Victory over these two barriers is a TRUE FEAT. If you are such a woman — accept my sincere congratulations. And if you are only on the way — I believe you will make it. And if I manage to complete both articles before the New Year 2026, then I hope this will become my gift to all of you, Women — not a candy, perhaps, rather respect.

And what, then, can men do? Exactly what you have long wanted from them, yet have not asked for aloud. Simply be honest: if a man truly loves you — ask him to stop flattering, indulging, and serving your weaknesses. This is not help; it is enslavement. A strong man is not afraid to tell this beloved that she's wrong. A weak one — stays silent, afraid of losing your favor. The courage TO BE TRUTHFUL — that is the true manifestation of love, even when it burns.

The true criterion of a mature woman lies not in the ability to manipulate, rather in the ability to act effectively in the world WITHOUT THESE manipulations. Want to test yourself? Walk through the mountains alone — not for the sake of extreme experience, rather for understanding: where your true Self begins, where makeup and coquetry end. You will understand that real men are inspired not by your appearance, not by outfits, and not by games of mystery. They are inspired by a HIGH LEVEL of awareness. Yes — that very state of spirit that is paid for at a high price — through pain, hardships, defeats, victories, and clarity. This is true feminine wisdom. And wisdom, as we know, has no gender.

If in the first article we, men, tried to speak with respect, even if with irony, then now we will allow ourselves to be merciless. So that everyone reads to the end — let us begin with a joke. I, as a not overly cautious person, decided to attempt a classification. I will divide women into three levels and four types. The levels are: Eve — a woman driven by nature and fear; Adam-like Eve — a woman whose intellect has awakened, yet still serves desires; Woman-Warrior — a woman who conquers herself, reality, and the world's lies. The types are: the Hen (south) — immersed in everyday life, offspring, and emotional warmth; the Chick (east) — eternally young and eternally searching, never maturing; the Diva (north) — cold, calculating, successful at survival yet not at Life; the Exalted Hysteric (west) — believes that feelings are more important than reality. This is only my opinion. Possibly — and most certainly — there are others.

A woman of any type CAN BE at any level. And she can grow. The key point — she can. However, only if she stops identifying herself with the concept of "woman" as some separate category. For by recognizing yourself as a "woman" in the social sense — you BUILD A WALL between yourself and the human race. Do not do this. Every being in the Universe must evolve — from helplessness to self-reliance, from dependence to maturity. This is what is called the PATH OF THE HUMAN.

Self-sufficiency does not mean living without men. It means being able to live without needing someone else's condescension. Some of you — forgive me — are not even capable of getting out of a car without assistance. This is unacceptable. Yes, thanks to civilization, survival has become easier. Yet what have you done with this saved energy? Have you invested it in awareness? Or in feng shui, lifestyle, and the illusion of "undeserved equality?" Forgive me, but I cannot help saying this: it is difficult to name female figures among the founders of great teachings, sciences, or arts. This is not a fault, RATHER AN INDICATOR. Female energy has a different structure. It strives to retain; possession is its way of controlling reality. Male energy is directed outward, toward the unknown. Therefore, a man, not seeking to possess — conquers, while a woman, seeking to hold on — often loses. And yet, if a woman understands that the world does not require adjustment to male models, but honesty with herself — she will be able to use her particular nature as a resource. And then — true equality will arise. Not in form, not in rights, not in clothing or voice. Rather in strength, in spirit, in the capacity to carry truth — to oneself and to others.

It is time to finally voice the paradox aloud: most often, the loudest claims of equality with men come from those women who are the furthest from it. Genuine maturity DOES NOT REQUIRE loud declarations — it either exists, or it does not. If a woman were truly equal, she would not demand equality — she would act. She would know the price of responsibility. And what today is most often disguised as “equality” is nothing more than a demand for rights without a readiness to bear responsibility for them. This is the essence of the delusion.

True power, no matter how it may appear outwardly, begins with the ability to take responsibility. For others, for decisions, for consequences. A man, even the most ordinary one, is forced to carry this burden from youth: he must NOT ONLY endure his own pain, he must also not be a burden to others; he must be a support and the one who decides. Before him there is no savior, no shoulder, no support. Before him stands reality, in its MERCILESS OBJECTIVITY. And although in a peaceful, civilized environment the line between male and female responsibility seems to blur, it is instantly exposed at the very first catastrophe. The nature of the world has not changed.

Power is not handed over — it is taken. And if a woman is given power as a gift, as a concession, this is not equality, it is mercy granted from above. Which means that power still belongs to the one who “gave” it. The nature of power is such that it is established THROUGH ACTION. And if someone has not affirmed themselves through a real contribution, rather has simply been given an opportunity, that is not strength, it is a display window.

Within the former Earth Governance System, inherited from extraterrestrial intervention programs, the very principle of power was constructed along a male vector — not in a social, rather in a neuro-informational sense — through brain genotypes (brain codes), logical dominance, and an orientation toward external transformation of the world. Therefore, women entering positions of power are forced to harden — not by character, rather BY THE REQUIREMENT of the environment itself. Femininity does not function there, just as soft fabric cannot hold a steel structure. Those who seek equality under such conditions sow even greater inequality. This is no longer a misunderstanding; it is a substitution of concepts. Feminism, when it demands not equal conditions rather superiority, becomes the very same thing that male chauvinism once was — simply from the other side. If you condemn male roughness yet glorify female aggression — you are not for equality, you are for YOUR OWN IMPUNITY. If you justify one form of deviation² and condemn another — you violate the very equality you claim to champion. The trouble is that such women have long ceased to be taken seriously. They are conceded to, agreed with, waved off. Not because they are right — rather because it is MEANINGLESS TO ARGUE.

² Deviation — types of deviation (behavioral deviations), classified by consequences (positive and negative), by form (addictive, aggressive, suicidal, etc.), and by mechanism of formation (primary and secondary), encompassing phenomena ranging from crime, drug addiction, and alcoholism to genius and creative play.

This is how the feeling of freedom is born, which in reality is isolation. They were left in a greenhouse, where they “develop” among imaginary victories and spiritual life hacks. Thus, they were deprived of wisdom itself — the laws of Being. Without it — everything that is achieved rests on self-deception.

The generalized woman-Eve, who has not developed into a Human, cannot survive alone: she will not build a house, provide for herself, or defend herself. Everything she has — is either given by a man, allowed by the system, or permitted by chance. And yet, survival is not the lowest stage, it is the entry point into TRUE DEVELOPMENT. Through survival — to Cognition. Through Cognition — to meaning. It is precisely in the realm of Cognition that the things humanity is proud of are created: teachings, discoveries, laws, paintings, technologies. And female names in this world — are not visible. This is not an accusation; it is a fact. One can either deny it or overcome it.

Men silently see how difficult it is for a woman to accept the truth about the world. And, at best, they DO NOT CONDEMN. Yet often it happens otherwise: a woman, instead of accepting reality, begins to assert her superiority, based on an inferiority complex. Thus, weakness begins to shout about itself, demanding recognition. However, weakness is not a female trait. Weakness is a deformation. It is not connected to gender, rather to the refusal to grow.

A woman, being less resilient to the pressure of the world, OFTEN INTUITIVELY seeks to protect herself — through power, manipulation, playing the victim, or subtle revenge. However, this very path becomes a trap for her, cutting off other forms of interaction — honest, conscious, strong ones. THIS IS A DEAD END. If only because in reality only half of women act this way. The other half — wise, trusting, capable of inner transformation — have long since found support within themselves. And therefore, if you do not pity yourself — the world itself will pity you. A pure being is given a high gift; a deceitful one — only an echo of their own naive desire. And even that — not for long. This does not mean that one should trust everyone indiscriminately — men or women. One must trust the Higher, while understanding what is happening. It — and only it — builds that precise Law by which those who correspond to your inner content come into your life. Lie within — and you will receive falsehood without. And often even a worthy person begins to behave unworthily simply because they have entered the field of ANOTHER'S IMPURITY. This is already your karma — if you have managed to distort someone else's essence. To govern — means not to subjugate; rather to manifest the will of the Higher.

Women often assert their “nature” by diminishing the male one. This is a downward path. Yin cannot rise if Yang has not risen. To appropriate everything good for oneself while attributing everything bad to men is a PRIMITIVE POLITICAL TECHNOLOGY of deception. A woman takes pride in giving birth — however, this is not her merit. It is a given, not a choice. To give birth is not yet to be a Mother. The essential thing is not to give birth; it is to raise — consciously and meaningfully.

Real strength does not require confirmation. It simply exists. It serves. It is aware of itself — and precisely for that reason it preserves itself. Weakness, however, when unaccepted, uncomprehended, and unovercome — demands recognition, because without it, it collapses. This is what distinguishes pride from dignity. Pride shouts; dignity remains silent.

A woman often elevates feelings above reason — asserting that intuition is higher than logic. Yet everyone has feelings — animals have them too. Feelings are necessary, but NOT AS a guide to action; rather, as a signal for reflection. For feelings are changeable, momentary, and not always accurate. Today you are in pain, tomorrow joyful — yet what is the overall movement? Only a DEVELOPED MIND can bind feelings into a single fabric of experience. It preserves stability. It does not allow one to drown in the illusion of the momentary. Without this inner linkage, without the capacity for stalking — rational observation and correction of feelings — a woman is doomed to an emotional pendulum, to a life of reactions. And the world demands not reaction, rather action. This is how the Path begins: not with yielding to emotion, rather with ITS AWARENESS. Then feelings become an instrument, not a master. And the soul, whether in the body of a woman or a man, takes its step — toward the Human.

For some time now, the expression “...well, she is a woman!” has been used as a universal justification — and has suddenly taken on a positive connotation. However, this is, in essence, an illusion. In such words there is not strength, rather HIDDEN CONDESCENSION. For to associate femininity with weakness is to demean its essence. Femininity is not the antonym of strength; it is one of its poles. Masculinity and femininity are not opposites, rather converging currents of a single energetic river. As both language and logic attest: weakness is not strength. And therefore, the true counterpart of masculinity is not helplessness, it is female strength — different in vector, yet equal in essence. Without this equality — there CANNOT be union nor meaning.

Thus, the main misunderstanding is born: many women demand “equality” yet MISTAKENLY ASSUME that it means imitation. True equality is the correspondence of forces, not symmetry of behavior. It is not about splitting the bill at a restaurant. Moreover, when a woman insists on paying in order “not to be indebted,” she herself reinforces the boundary, destroying what she supposedly strives for. Whoever invites — pays. Whoever has — shares. This is the true order, based on respect rather than fear of inequality. Partnership is not antagonism, it is complementarity. True cooperation IMPLIES CONTRIBUTION, not compensation for deficiency. And if we speak of forces, let us honestly acknowledge: female strength is real. It is different. Its vector is directed not outward, rather inward. A woman is a bearer of stability, survivability, preservation, and connection with matter. She is a master of arranging, harmonizing, and accumulating. Yet alone — this can turn into stagnation, into routine for the sake of routine. A man, on the other hand, carries impulse, movement, direction. Yet by himself — he can lose his way, stray, distort the goal. His striving without the woman’s stability often collapses.

Thus, the design itself was conceived: two wings of a single flight. A man lifts off from the ground; a woman keeps the fall from happening. A man carries ruthlessness and mastery; a woman — patience and gentleness. Yet NO ONE WILL BECOME whole if they do not master all qualities. The Higher, having divided the Whole into Two, did not deprive them of a shared purpose: the path to union lies — THROUGH SOVERCOMING SELF. And this is impossible without a deep understanding of both one’s own nature and the nature of the other. Simply living under one roof is not enough. Even talking is not enough. One must acquire the ability to listen, to comprehend, and to integrate. This is where that very true equality lies: equality in responsibility for the path and in the striving toward the Higher.

Female nature instinctively gravitates toward building a family, choosing a partner, and continuing the lineage. This is its ancient vector, embedded evolutionarily and in some places even programmatically. However, it is important to remember that even this program is NOT THE ONLY one, and even less so — an exhaustive purpose of life. Moreover, even in this field that is so important to her — a woman often turns out to be not a master, rather a participant in a chaotic experiment. She grabs the first person she meets, charms him, hopes for the magic of love — and then “somehow it will work out." However, "somehow" is NOT THE PATH of the Human. Relationships require maturity, and one should enter them already as oneself, already as a formed soul. If relationships are dear to you — you have no right to enter them as a semi-finished product, as an expectation that someone else will assemble you completely. Relationships are not just a matrix for reproduction. The mere constant generation of new lives, without the growth and development of those lives — is meaningless. And therefore, relationships themselves, without effort, without self-observation and inner work — are NO DIFFERENT from a laboratory experiment.

The true question of this article is not how to build relationships, rather what a woman must do to become a Human, to become a warrior. And here lies the trouble. A woman often does not conceive of herself outside relationships, outside a pair, outside the context of "us." And this is a SERIOUS WEAKNESS. The absence of a strategy beyond personal life, the absence of interests, goals, and aspirations not tied to a man or a family — is a refusal of selfhood. In immature relationships, it is easiest to lose respect for the opposite sex — for without understanding oneself, it is difficult to understand another. And without understanding — judgment inevitably follows. Therefore, if you already have a relationship — that is good, yet treat it as a task in which you must not only love, but also change; not only gain experience, but also process it into wisdom.

justification for a lifetime. A cleansed conscience does not keep this feat hostage forever. And certainly, one should not turn everyday activity — cleaning, cooking, household routine — into an instrument of blackmail. This too is part of life, and if it is yours — do it honestly, without shouting, without bargaining.

Experience in relationships is invaluable. Even if it seems excessive — it will return. It will return not from a partner, rather from the world itself, AS CONFIRMATION of maturity. And if it seems that you did too much in a relationship, most likely you did exactly as much as you were meant to — you were simply measuring with the wrong scales. Women often confuse effort with result. However, relationships are not a market exchange. They are more like a small communism: each gives according to conscience, and receives according to need — no more and no less. If something is wrong in a family — start with yourself. This is not a slogan; it is an algorithm. A family is a common enterprise: if it is difficult — help; if you cannot — do not interfere. And yes, the birth of a child is not the entirety of a woman's mission. It is only a STARTING POINT. A month, a year, two — is not a

Yes, there are different kinds of men. Yet allow me — you chose them yourself, did you not? Or do they continue to choose you, and you agree? Then treat that choice as your own responsibility. This chapter is not about men. It is about you — and only for you. Hypothetically — yet honestly.

Equality in relationships is an extremely rare category. It almost DOES NOT OCCUR in nature, and even when it seems to exist — it is either not noticed or turns out to be highly conditional. Happy are those who are satisfied not with abstract justice, rather with the real distribution of roles that has emerged through shared living. It is precisely this distribution that constitutes the practical answer to the question of equality. The world is arranged gradient-wise: between two poles there is always a difference, and this difference is what drives movement, growth, development. If there is no difference, if roles are erased and distinctions leveled — the need for development disappears as well. Therefore, total equality is not a path, it is a standstill, if not a step backward. However, there is another format — relationships as cooperation. When the goal is not the process of “being together” itself, rather a shared external effort, a common cause, a project, a path. Then everything takes on a different scale: differences become useful, complementary, oriented in one direction. Want to know whether you have equality? Swap roles and responsibilities for at least a month. Many interesting things will become clear. Equality is NOT “SAMENESS,” it is the ability to substitute for one another without loss of meaning or effectiveness. If this ability exists — you are equals. If it does not — someone is playing for two.

If you do not have a relationship, this is by no means a reason to search for one frantically — especially according to the templates of passion, fear of loneliness, or social norms. Perhaps this is a unique time — for solitude, for accumulation, for maturation. To be alone is not a punishment, rather a privilege, if YOU KNOW how to live self-sufficiently. Only in solitude can one clearly see where what is yours ends and where what is imposed begins. Who are you when there is no one nearby? What are you capable of? What are you filled with? What do you live by? In relationships, without knowing yourself, you will not be able to calculate either your own efforts or those of another. And therefore — you will not understand whether what you call love is fair, sincere, or real.

In relationships, what matters most is not what will be given to you, rather what YOU WILL BRING. To give — one must have. And to have — one must accumulate. And what to accumulate — you already know: awareness, honesty, knowledge, experience, skill, resilience, strength of spirit. All that which turns a woman into a Human, and a Human into a master of the path. It is important to understand: female nature is not about makeup, gait, or intonation. It is not a theatrical set of mannerisms; it is a WAY OF SURVIVAL and realization. It is not external, it is internal: a deep structure of interaction with life. And, paradoxically, one can learn female nature not only from women, just as masculinity — not only from men. Natural energies are universal, and the task is not to imitate, it is to know — from within, through labor and the path.

The world places the same demands on everyone. It DOES NOT DISTINGUISH whether before it stands a man or a woman; it distinguishes only one thing — effectiveness. A Human must be able to act effectively in any conditions, under any rules of the game — and at the same time not lose oneself. Effectiveness is when you know how to win not at the expense of others, not by deceiving, not by scheming, rather in such a way that “nothing will happen to you for it.” IN OTHER WORDS — HONESTLY. Transparently. Nobly. Effectiveness is when the world itself confirms: you are acting correctly, and therefore the right people, the right events, the right opportunities come into your life. When you receive more than you asked for — that is the sign. You are on the right path. And it means that equality has already taken place within you — as equality with the Law, with the Higher, with Conscience.

Woman, man, and Human are not categories for comparison, rather stages along the path of awareness. The inequality so often discussed lies not in gender, rather in the level of honesty, maturity, and striving for Truth. The world does not demand sameness from us; it DEMANDS CONFORMITY. And if a woman, remaining a woman, rises to the heights of the Human — she overcomes twice as much as a man. Likewise, a man who manages to develop not strength rather wisdom, not rigidity but awareness, becomes one who is worthy of standing beside a woman not in domination, rather in alliance. The true strength of a woman lies in the ability to transcend what is imposed, to see where falsehood has been accepted as nature, and to step beyond that illusion. The true strength of a man lies not in superiority, rather in the ability to become a support without turning that support into shackles. Only in such balance is a Human born — not by sex, rather by level. By the capacity not only to be, rather to become. NOT ONLY to survive, rather to know. Not only to follow, but also to lead.

Everything that was discussed in these two articles is not about rights, not about social equality, not about gender justice. It is about movement toward true Humanity. Toward that form of life where gender is an instrument of experience, not the essence. Where difference is a path to complementarity, not to conflict. Where the strong do not humiliate the weak, and the weak do not manipulate the strong. Where everyone becomes who they are — without masks, without ideology, without fear of being rejected for the truth. This is a difficult path. Yet, do easy paths ever lead to Truth? And if you managed not to reject what you read, not to take offense, not to close yourself off, rather to reflect — then you have already taken a step. A step that separates you from mass attitudes, suggestions, and templates. A step that brings you closer not just to maturity, rather to freedom. To understand and accept what is written is also a step in the direction of Defeating death and overcoming old age. Because death begins with lies — about oneself, about others, about the world. And life continues where honesty begins.
